This was done so as not to dilute the focus on the present and future practice of dubbing. To substitute this, a copy of the article with the same title by M. There are few film-making practices or practices of film distribution in the world more emblematic of the late twentieth century than the Tamil cinema. Indeed, its very scale, its multiplicity of characters, its association with the daily urban life of India and the extreme diversity of the social groupings it has reached have made it perhaps the best exemplar of the poly-ethnic, multi-lingual, urban culture of India today. A culture at once diverse and cosmopolitan and thoroughly local in its origins. Thus, of the eight-odd languages of South India (all spoken in Karnataka and Tamil Nadu) that are now in regular use in TV, movies, even radio, the number of speakers of them who are in the elite stratum of the society is small, and of these, very few, if any, can read the language as a first language. The overwhelming majority of the people who watch and listen to the multi-lingual broadcasting in south India are either illiterate or semi-illiterate, and so the films are not meant to be read, but to be "heard," "felt," "understood," and so on. In this they are like some of the Indian language films that have been shot in Kannada, and by default in Hindi, to cater for the overwhelming numbers of people who do not speak either Kannada or Hindi. Thus, the Tamil cinema has been a giant laboratory of ideas, emotions f678ea9f9e
